The purpose of this course is to help teachers and paraprofessionals to avoid getting locked into the label of autism and failing to see the whole child. The abilities of children with autism are often underestimated! In this course we will discuss the following topics: the importance of early intervention, teaching for different types of thinking, developing talent, motivating students, keeping high expectations, and much more!

This course will not only provide an introduction to autism (data, characteristics, family, etc.), but will also provide strategies for immediate use in an educational setting (developing talent, motivating students, keeping high expectations for students, lessons and activities, etc.). Strategies for collaborating with parents of these children and strategies for a positive and professional relationship between teachers and their paraprofessionals will also be given.

Based on the experiences of Dr. Temple Grandin, as well as the instructor's personal experience as both an educator and an autism mom, the participants of this course can expect to gain a wealth of knowledge about autism and how people with autism need to be educated/respected.

"Service to all who educate."

Resilience is associated with greater Job satisfaction, work happiness, organizational commitment and employee engagement. Raising resilience contributes improved self-esteem, a sense of control over life events, a sense of purpose in life and improved interpersonal relationships. So, yes, educators need a lot of it. Our job is all about control, purpose and relationships. This course will offer seven research-based habits for educators to use in their professional practice-inside the classroom and out.
